The editorial office has been notified of the following error.

During the post-acceptance editing process, the following sentences were incorrectly revised, appearing in the article as follows: “Therefore, SNAP purchasing power could be increased for people at risk of health problems by expanding medical expense subsidy programs. Currently, only seniors and individuals receiving a disability benefit receive subsidies (healthcare costs >$35/month).” The sentences should have read as follows: “Therefore, SNAP purchasing power could be increased for people at risk of health problems by expanding the medical expense deduction. Currently, only seniors and individuals receiving a disability benefit receive the deduction (healthcare costs >$35/month).” The publisher apologizes for this error. The article has since been corrected online.
